Greasy Rider

By Greg Melville

Algonquin Books, $15.95, 257 pages

A coast-to-coast drive might not sound that cool, but when you can do it on recycled cooking oil, that's bound to draw some interest. And that's exactly what Greg Melville did. From Vermont to California in a supped up 1985 Mercedes diesel station wagon driven on recyclable oil from restaurant dumpsters, him and his college buddy go on a cross country road trip to explore possible new ways of super green reusable fuel. From the green-friendly headquarters of Google to an environmentally safe Wal-Mart, these two college friends go an investigative adventure to figure out how to make this planet better.

While simultaneously making you bust a gut with laughter and considering ways to reduce your carbon footprint, this book is a must buy. Anyone can enjoy it, and if you and your friends all read it, maybe you can plan a road trip to help make this world a better place.
